Overview

For her longstanding business and corporate, health care, construction, and real estate clients in both Rhode Island and Massachusetts, Susan works diligently and draws on her business and legal background to understand their business and legal needs, providing innovative yet practical solutions to their pressing problems. With her in-depth experience and years of counseling executives and senior management, Susan effectively assists clients to minimize potential litigation and disputes.

From high-stakes acquisitions, mergers, joint ventures and strategic alliances, from negotiation and drafting construction documents for owners, design professionals, and contractors, to all aspects of the construction process, including land acquisition and project financing to documentation, from secured lending and other forms of corporate finance structuring, to corporate governance and business succession planning, Susan provides her clients with strategic counsel and advice.

Susan is also adept at advising health care professionals and institutional providers across a wide spectrum of issues, including licensing, managed-care products, provider agreements, employment relationships, medical fraud and abuse, regulatory compliance, and medical-staff organization and credentialing. Susan is a member of the American Health Lawyers Association and, for more than five years, served as the legal writer for the monthly Health Care Professional.

Susan is a frequent pro bono speaker to legal, charitable, and community groups and published author on legal and ethics topics.

Experience

- When the largest multi-location medical practice in a particular specialty in Rhode Island, wanted to sell their practice to a national private equity firm, Susan worked with the stockholders who were at different stages of their professional careers, each with different objectives, to help achieve consensus. She negotiated the sale of the assets of three affiliated entities (the professional practice, the management company, and the equipment company) as well as leases for each of the locations, the employment agreements of each of the physicians and their agreements with the buyer's parent company in which each physician received an equity interest. This type of transaction required expertise and a highly specialized focus, not only in corporate transactions and tax, but also in the health care regulatory area, to help achieve clients' diverse objectives.
- When a national designer and manufacturer of premium paperboard packaging for all products and industries sought to sell its company to an Italian—based global packaging group, Susan provided legal representation and strategy to negotiate a transaction that achieved all the client's goals. The sale involved a significant number of international tax and accounting issues. In addition, the timing of the consummation of the transaction was very complicated, as the sale was one component of a multipart acquisition with a simultaneous merger of the target companies and their conversion into a new United States subsidiary, and Susan kept the deal on track and on schedule.

- When the owner of a major multi-state plumbing and heating supply company wanted to sell his equity to the world's largest manufacturer of heating, cooling, and refrigerant products, Susan negotiated the terms of the sale, a long-term consulting agreement for the owner, and leases for all the seller's locations in the different states. The seller's company was an existing distributor of several of the buyer's residential unitary and light commercial products, and Susan's legal representation allowed a smooth transition for the owner to capitalize on his long history of successful operations as well as a mutually well-developed and profitable relationship with a significant supplier.
- When an out-of-state, for-profit hospice provider wanted to obtain a license from the Rhode Island Department of Health, Susan helped the client navigate its way through the regulatory process, anticipating and overcoming all objections raised and challenges encountered. She helped demonstrate to the state agency and other interested parties that a for-profit healthcare provider could deliver high-quality services and be a good corporate citizen.
- When the founders of a successful closely-held business wanted to structure a transfer of ownership to their children as well as to certain longtime employees, Susan devised and implemented a transition plan that enabled a harmonious relationship among the directors and the shareholders, with mechanisms for decision-making to avoid deadlock and dissipation of the assets and to promote the long-term success and welfare of the company.
- When a local company was in danger of defaulting on a substantial loan to Susan's European client and a major supplier to the Rhode Island corporation, Susan negotiated a conversion of the debt to a controlling equity interest in the company to protect her client's interests and provide a continued source of future sales.
